Btw - related to the report, this an NPR reporting that in the absence of a price on carbon (b/c too politically challenging) Robert Rubin suggests the next best policy option is to require disclosure by companies of risks to their assets from changes in climate. This would be an SEC regulation. Currently this is voluntary, not mandatory, and very few comps disclose (and I would think the disclosure may also be flawed if companies are not fully aware of potential risks).

We have that later in the background. Will look to see if it makes more sense in the bio section or the background section.
